Local Customary Law in Baduy

Baduy is an area located in Banten province, Indonesia, which is famous for their conservative customs and culture. Customary law in Baduy greatly affects people's lives and is still upheld by them. Baduy customs are based on Sunda Wiwitan teachings, which are local religions inherited from their ancestors. In Baduy custom, people's lives are governed by rules inherited from generation to generation.

Baduy customary law is different from Indonesia's national legal system. Although the Indonesian government has tried to adapt customary law to the national legal system, significant differences still remain. For example, in Baduy customary law, violations are punishable by ransom or social work, whereas in national legal systems, violations are often punishable by confinement or higher fines.

Baduy customary law greatly influences the behavior and decisions of the community. They uphold their customary rules and ensure that they follow all existing rules. One of the clearest examples of the influence of Baduy customary law is in the matter of marriage. In Baduy custom, marriage is only permitted between Baduy people and people who are also from Baduy. This is done to keep their customs and traditions maintained.

Although Baduy customary law is still highly respected and upheld by the community, there are several threats that threaten the continuity of their customary law. One such threat is modernization and globalization. In the era of globalization, the Baduy people continue to be faced with cultural influences from outside that can threaten their customs and traditions. Therefore, efforts must be made to promote and strengthen the existence of Baduy customary law so that it can continue to be preserved.

Overall, Baduy customary law plays an important role in people's lives and is still an integral part of their culture. Although there are some differences between Baduy customary law and the national legal system,
